Weeghman chose a site at Clark and Addison Streets, which was then a largely undeveloped area. The stadium was built in just four months, and it opened on April 23, 1914. The Whales played their first game at the new stadium on April 25, 1914, and they defeated the Kansas City Packers 6-1.

The new stadium was a huge success, and it quickly became one of the most popular baseball stadiums in the country. The Whales drew over 1 million fans to the stadium in their first season, and they led the Federal League in attendance.

However, the Federal League folded after the 1915 season, and the Whales were disbanded. The stadium was then sold to William Wrigley Jr., the owner of the Chicago Cubs. Wrigley renamed the stadium Wrigley Field, and the Cubs began playing there in 1916.
