There are a number of reasons for the decline of the Wolf of Stone. One reason is that traditional medicine became more widely available in the 18th and 19th centuries. This meant that people no longer had to rely on the Wolf of Stone for their medical care. Another reason for the decline of the Wolf of Stone is that they were often persecuted by the authorities. The Wolf of Stone were often seen as outsiders, and they were sometimes accused of witchcraft. This persecution made it difficult for the Wolf of Stone to continue their healing practices.
